

Compiling Everything Together

Ryan Blackburn | Weekly Report 11/6 - 11/12

After a week full of drafting, revision, and completion of projects, my research is coming to a conclusion; every postulation and detail has been amalgamated into cohesive understanding of the influences put on policymakers. As I progressed throughout this week, it was a relief to be able to put my knowledge of each section together, creating a structured process that reviewed each aspect discussed in research papers and interviews. From this, I feel that I can more greatly present myself in a formal manner, knowing completely well that there is work and evidence to back the claims I present when discussing my topic. Not only that, but in an attempt to compile this information together for a comprehensive overview of my topic I have understood the value of proper preparation and a love for one's topic of study.

Endeavoring to explain the procedural steps that characterize any proposed policy's track towards legality in the public eye, my research presentation has allowed me the capacity to acknowledge the extensive benefits of efficient development of a project or idea. Indeed, after setting new deadlines and requirements for myself, I have realized that such habits allow for a much more eased mind and more in-depth, analytical work as the end product. With that, the compilation of these lessons and theories on state public policy has encouraged the presence of an underlying motivation as the true catalyst for a better and more cohesive final result. The tasks of drafting a speech and organizing visual aids all flowed together more easily when I realized that having a drive to accomplish something for a greater purpose - for me, political awareness - leads to such results.